Time management is key

The first test series of 2022 is underway, and it's expected that you might be stressed. However, it is important to keep in mind that these tests form part of the bigger picture. These test results can be used as an indication towards which subjects you are coping with – and which subjects you need to spend more time on.

Remember that classes and task submissions continue as normal during this test series – you will however be excused from lessons that you might miss due to writing a test, and you can catch up on these by watching the recordings. The reason for lessons continuing despite the test series, is to ensure that all content is covered during the year. At Brainline, our vast subject complement results in a test timetable that stretches over several weeks.

With the lessons continuing as normal, you might wonder where you will get enough time to study. This is where time management plays a role.

Draw up a weekly schedule which indicates all your lessons and any activities you might need to attend.

Include time you spend with friends, family and keeping active.

Fill in all "blank" times as time that you will spend studying and preparing for tests and submitting tasks.

Ensure that you know which test you are writing – don't mix up the dates – there is only one opportunity to write – if you mix up the dates, you will not be afforded an opportunity to write again.

Refer to your Subject Information Booklets to know what you are writing about.

Remember to stay focused and remember that these tests are an opportunity to determine where you are at and to work hard towards what you would like to achieve.

Should you need assistance with anxiety, stress and time management, please contact mentor@brainline.com.
